

Ten Things You May Experience From Teaching Online - Turned Up To 12 from Daniel Currie

1. Fewer miles on the road
2. Added flexibility with your time, overall
3. New tools to supplement your teaching methods
4. New ways to connect with your students
5. Changing perspective about your class work product - from one-time short-term single use to long term assets
6. Your students will contact you first for technical assistance
7. Your students will appreciate your prompt responses and will tell you so
8. You may become immersed in the technical bits and lose contact with your students
9. Some days you'll feel like a technician, not a teacher
10. Your ability and willingness to actively communicate with your students will be critical in how they perceive you, your class, your college, and your institution
11. The "technical" competence of student varies - do not expect everyone to navigate our systems without some difficulty
12. Collaboration tools that you use with colleagues work equally well with students
